Maya: Good morning, and welcome to your Mahrin Morning Briefing for Saturday, October third, twenty twenty-six. I'm Maya.

Devon: And I'm Devon. It is going to be a scorcher of a Saturday, Maya. This is the hottest day of the whole week.

Maya: It really is. We are looking at a high of ninety-three degrees today under sunny skies, and even the bay side will feel the warmth. If you have outdoor plans, bring water and take it easy in the afternoon heat.

Devon: The National Weather Service is warning of excessive heat across Mahrin this weekend, so take it seriously. Check on neighbors who may need a cool place to rest, and keep pets indoors during the hottest hours.

Maya: Sunday brings morning clouds that give way to afternoon sun, with a high of eighty-nine. Then comes a slow cool-down through the week. Monday hits eighty-seven, Tuesday eighty-three, and by Wednesday we drop to seventy-nine with just a slight chance of rain.

Devon: Thursday settles at seventy-five, and Friday falls to sixty-eight, mostly sunny, with that same slight chance of rain late in the week. So the pattern is a hot weekend, then a steady slide into cooler, more autumn-like weather.

Maya: Now the tides. On the bay side today, the high tide reaches five point eight feet just after five P M, with a low of three point five feet late this morning. Over on the ocean side at Point Reyes, the high tide peaks at five point eight feet around four twenty-three P M.

Devon: Through the week, both sides stay in a comfortable band, with highs mostly between five and six feet and early-morning lows hovering near zero. Noah is not flagging anything above normal this week, so tides are well within the normal range.

Maya: One thing worth keeping in the back of your mind. Noah's Climate Prediction Center says this El Nino is still strengthening, with a greater than ninety percent chance of a very strong event this fall and winter. Mahrin County is already preparing for winter storms and king tides, with new funding for flood protection and emergency response.

Devon: Let's turn to local news. First, that heat. Mahrin County put out a warning Friday that excessive heat is expected this weekend, with the hottest temperatures inland today. Cooling centers will be open, and the county is urging everyone to stay hydrated and limit strenuous activity during peak heat.

Maya: Second story. If you see smoke on the mountain, do not panic. The Mahrin County Fire Department, Mahrin Water, and California State Parks have announced plans for a prescribed burn on Mount Tamalpais, possibly as early as Tuesday, October fifteenth, near the Mountain Theater on East Ridgcrest Boulevard. Fire planners made the area special, while supporters say the district's streets, stairs, and storm drains badly need the investment.

Maya: That is your Mahrin Morning Briefing for Saturday. Stay cool today, keep an eye on the burn alerts midmonth, and we will see you tomorrow morning.

Devon: Have a great Saturday, Mahrin County.
